

Videographer FAQ's

What is DVD?

DVD (either Digital Video Disc or Digital Versatile Disc) is essentially a CD that can hold audio and video. Unlike a video tape, it has an infinite shelf life. DVD also has twice the resolution as a video tape and CD quality audio. By having your wedding transferred to a DVD you will preserve the video in the same resolution that it was originally recorded in. This is a fairly new process and like anything new there is a premium for it.

What does three chip mean?

This is a type of camera is also called a 3 chip camera and typically reproduces a broadcast quality image. It is different from your consumer cameras in that it takes and combines three separate signals (red, green, blue) and uses an onboard processor to combine them to make the video. In a consumer camcorder all the colors that come through the lens are processed by one chip. This can usually be a sign of quality if your videographer uses a 3 CCD Camera. They are also better in low light situations than a consumer camcorder. This allows the best in picture color and clarity.

Should my wedding be videotaped?

A photo will capture a moment, but video will capture the event. You've dreamt about it for a lifetime, planned the day for months and then -- it's over in a day. Only video can capture, in motion and sound every detail, the vows, your laughter, the speeches and the music. Video coverage of weddings is quickly catching up with photographic coverage of weddings.

Why should I hire a professional videographer?

A professional has better equipment than a regular consumer, and can edit your video into a finished product that will dazzle you and your family for years. It will be a video you will love to show your family and friends often. The most important aspect of hiring a professional is experience. Therefore we can bring all of our experience and professionalism to every event and can shoot with confidence.

Will you get in the way of our photographer?

Absolutely not. We also realize the importance of letting the photographer do their job without us getting in his or her way. We pride ourselves on our discreet shooting style. Your guests will realize that the day is being filmed but will not be bothered by us in any way. It's very important that your photographer and videographer can work as a team. Photographers have commented that they like the fact we do not use a lot of lights.
